The actresses of the opera were the choirists, and great crowds of busy, talkstive people were in the habit of frequenting the gallery of the chapel, from the windows of which the First Consult and Josephine could be seen with their suits and friends. The whole formed merely a daily exhibition of the consolar court to the people.

At one particular time the punctuality of Bonaparte in his attendance on mass was rather distressing to his wife. The quick and jealous Josephine had discovered that the eye of her hisband was too much directed to a window in the gallery, where there regularly appeared the form and face of a young girl of uncommon beauty.
